We are motivated by different things. I'm motivated by my friends, family, and role models. They keep me going when I am ready to give up and move on. They say encouraging things to me that make me want to do better, and go further in my knowledge.

A leader stands out by having a steady tone of voice, always making eye contact with who they are talking to, they are in charge – but they don't talk down to them, they treat everyone as equals and when new people come in – leaders build them up so that they can stand at their level of intelligence, and a leader has made a leader too. At our age, adults look to us as an example of leadership. We're more than examples – we're the real deal.

It is difficult being a leader because sometimes other girls don't understand what it feels like to be a leader because they are too wrapped around drama to put their heads straight. Some people make it out that being a leader is "bossy" or "irrational" or "very annoying". A leader is a person who is ready to make decisions and they keep going with it, and if they make a mistake they just throw it over their shoulder and move on.

forget the risk
and take the fall.
if it's what you want,
then it's worth it all.
